Andrew Saleeby joins Nexsen Pruet's esteemed tax group as Special Counsel after years of policy and litigation work at the South Carolina Department of Revenue. His practice focuses on state and local and federal tax, economic development, business, and regulatory laws.

Andrew's background as a CPA provides him with a unique business perspective that he brings to the table when working with clients. Whether he is representing clients in tax controversy matters, walking them through the process of earning tax and other economic development incentives for their projects, or helping structure business formations, sales, and acquisitions in a tax-efficient manner, Andrew believes his clients' money is better off in their hands than the government's, because the client understands the value of that dollar. The philosophy that money is spent more efficiently by those who earn it guides Andrew in every matter. Before joining South Carolina Department of Revenue, Andrew practiced with a prestigious South Carolina law firm counseling clients on economic development incentives, tax planning and compliance for partnerships, corporations, and other business conduits, and controversies against the Internal Revenue Service and South Carolina Department of Revenue.

Andrew's legal career began when he enrolled at the University of South Carolina School of Law, where he received CALI awards for Partnership and LLC Tax, Corporate Tax, and Estate and Gift Tax. The faculty presented him with the Arthur B. Custy Award, signifying the School's most outstanding tax student.

Following law school, Andrew enrolled at NYU School of Law and earned his LL.M. in taxation. Although Andrew did well in all his courses at NYU, he was the top performer in partnership taxation.
