The University of Georgia Press has published a new book entitled South Carolina Women: Their Lives and Times, Volume 3. The trilogy traces the impact of women, including Nexsen Pruet attorney Vickie Eslinger, on South Carolina from the sixteenth century to present day.

The chapter "Champions of Women's Rights in South Carolina" begins on page 373 and details the work of Eslinger, and four other women, who have devoted much of their lives and careers to the cause of women's rights.

An excerpt:

"... it took the courage of these five South Carolina women to affiliate themselves with the women's movement and take the lead in confronting injustices faced by women in their state. They were active in the movement in state and national organizations. Fighting gender discrimination by the state and the private sector, they sought redress of grievances in the legislature as well as the courts....

Though Vickie Eslinger is one of the youngest of this group of five, it is often said that she launched the modern women's rights movement in South Carolina through her legal battle to gain the right to serve as a page in the state senate (the so-called page suit)."
